The Conserbatibe.

A Maine Liquor Law to be Urged in Ohio.

At the late Temperance State Convention at Columbus it was resolved to submit the following resolutions to the State Legislature, which meets next January the subject of a memorial to the Legis lature of the State respectfully report the following recommendations; That the Convention request the Executive Committee, at an early day, to take the best legal counsel, and mature the most radical, and at the same time the most practicable measures, looking to the attainment of the following objects:

1. The enactment by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, at ats next session, of a law prohibiting entirely the sale of intoxicating liquors within the State, except for medicinal or mechanical purposes, and providing that sales for these purposes shall be made only by persons under bonds of at least one thousand dollars not to violate such law; and

2. The enactment of a law providing for the establishment within the State of an asylum for inebriates; and that the Executive Committee be requested to prepare and distribute throughout the State suitable forms of petitions for the signatures of the people, and to use the most efficient measures to secure the passage of such laws by the Legis-

The Man Who Getteth on a Spree The following, from the Richmond

Examiner, may possibly have som application in this latitude:

There is a class of men of peculiar habits in every community, not only in the populous city, but in the quiet and peaceful country village, whose hearts are open to generous impulses, and whose minds are not unfrequently endowed with genius, at whom the Pharisee points the finger of scorn, and for whose short-comings and failings society in general has but little sym-pathy. We allude to the habitual spreer-the man who getteth up be times in the morning and cock-taileth, and repeateth the dose an indefinite number of times, until his brain whirleth, his legs refuseth their office, and he sinketh down on the soft side of the pavement, a helpless victim to the wifes of Bourbon or needle gun whisky, as the case may be. Such men often keep sober for many weeks, and then, under the influence of the times, fancied misfortune, or a well-filled purse, think they may venture to take one drink. It will dispel care, raise the spirits, and set them on their feet again. The drink is taken, and this drink begetteth an appetite for another. The spirits begin to rise, and a happy feeling of prosperity warms up heart. The devotee of John Barleycorn has commenced his practice at the bar in earnest. A party of jolly fellows come in, and he treated, and is treated in return. His little pile of currency becomes "small by degrees and beautifully less." So long as it lasts he is generous, and never lacks for "a friends" to join him in a drink. Finally his legs begin to get drunk, but his bram is clear. He knows what he is about, and will stop when he has got enough. Another drink, and another, until a search of the innermost recess of his pocket fails to bring to light another dime. He asks the barkeeper for credit. "We don't do business in that way," is the ready reply. By this time he is pretty drank all over, staggers out, and falling into some friendly doorway, sinks into the arms of "nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep." If he happens to escape the notice of the vigilant policeman, he awakes at a late hour of the night, minus hat and shoes, which have been taken possession of by some wayfarer whose necessities doubtless drove him to the act. Hatless and shoeless he goes to his lodgings, and after a troubled eleep wakes up with a burning thirst He has no money, but must have a drink and he gets it. In fact, a man can manage by shrowd engineering to get whisky when he can't get anything else. The experiments of the previous day are repeated, and kept up, perhaps, for a week, when the jolly chap becomes sick, takes medicine, sees the folly of his course, makes marvelous resolutions, and swears he will never touch another drop. And, generally speaking, he never does—until the next time. Upon the least rising or without getting drunk, whereby he loses the confidence of his employer, plunges his family into the depths of woe, and finally becomes an outcast from society, and the associate of bummers and vagabonds. And, baving brought him to this level, we close our brief sermon on the man who getteth on a spree.

KNOW THY DESTINY!

MADAME E. F. THORNTON, the great English Astrologist, Clairvoyant and Psychometrician, who has astonished the secientific classes of the Old Word, has now located hernext time. Upon the least rising or sinking of the mercury in the mental thermometer, he is off again, showing that fair promises, like pie-crust, are easily broken.

There are many young men of excellent business qualifications, who will doubtless recognize their own daguerreotype in the picture we have drawn. It is this class who ought never to taste a drop. Your old soaker can take his regular drams with no immediate perceptible effect; but it tells on him in time, and the man with the poker gets after him, sooner or later. But the young man who has acquired a habit of spreeing can never drink without getting drunk, whereby he tions sacredly confidential. Address, in confidence, Madame E. F. Thornion, P. O.
